* Oedīpus, i. & Oedīpŏdis. m. The son of Laius and Jocasta. Laius, king of Thebes, having married Jocasta the daughter of Creon, understood by the oracle, that they should have a son born of that marriage, who should kill him; on which account he commanded Jocasta to strangle all the children she should bear. Oedipus being born, his mother gave him to a shepherd to kill, but he made holes in his feet, and ran an ozier twig through them, wherewith he hung up Oedipus to a tree on mount Cithæron. The herdsman of Polybus king of Corinth coming that way, found and carried him to the queen, who having no children, brought him up as her own. When he was grown up, understanding he was not the son of Polybus, he consulted the oracle, in order to know who was his father, and being answered, that he should find him in Phocis; went thither, and there, as his father was appeasing a tumult, unwittingly killed him. From thence he went to Thebes, which was at that time annoyed by the monster Sphinx, who proposed enigmatical questions to all passengers, and if they could not resolve them, presently devoured them, insomuch that no body durst come near the city. Hereupon they had recourse to the oracle, who answered, that they could not be freed from the monster unless her riddle were explained. Creon, who had possessed himself of the kingdom after the death of Laius, caused it to be published throughout all Greece, that he would quit his kingdom, and give Jocasta in marriage to any one that should explain the riddle. Oedipus hereupon undertook and effected it, and, as a reward, had the kingdom given him, and ignorantly married his own mother, by whom he had two sons, Eteocles and Polynices, and two daughters, Antigone and Ismene, who all came to tragical ends. During his reign the kingdom was almost depopulated by a terrible plague, which they were told by the oracle was not to cease but by the banishment of the murderer of Laius. Upon this they had recourse to necromancy for the discovery of him, and Oedipus was found to be the person; who coming then to know that he had been guilty of parricide and incest, pulled out both his eyes, and condemned himself to perpetual banishment.

Philōtis, ĭdis. f. A maid ſervant at Rome. After the city of Rome was taken and ſacked by the Gauls, and their ſtrength greatly leſſened, the Fidenates thinking it a good opportunity to deſtroy the new riſen State, aſſembled a great army under the command of Livius Poſthuminius dictator of Fidenæ, who ſent a herald to the Senate of Rome, requiring them to deliver into their hands all their wives and daughters, or they would deſtroy the remains of their city. This happening ſo ſoon after their late misfortune, mightily perplexed the Senate, and put the Romans into great trouble and conſternation. While they were in this confuſion, Philotis propoſed to the Senate that ſhe and the other female ſlaves ſhould be ſent to the ſoldiers, dreſſed like matrons, and their daughters. This deſign was approved and preſently put in execution; and the enemy, on the arrival of the women, fell to drinking and rejoicing. When Philotis perceived that they were plunged into an excess of riot, she climbed up into a wild figtree, and gave a signal to the Romans with a lighted torch, who came and fell upon the Fidenates, and, as they were buried in wine and luxury, easily destroyed them. For this the maid servants were made free, and portions given them out of the publick treasure; and to preserve the memory of the action, an annual holyday was kept in honour of Juno, on the seventh day of July, who from the figtree was called Juno Caprotina, and the day Nonæ Caprotinæ, Varr. & Macr.

His elder brother Titan was prevailed upon to assign over his right to him, which he did on this condition, that Saturn should destroy all his male children, that so the kingdom might return to Titan's posterity; which Saturn performed devouring the males as soon as born. But when Jupiter and Juno were born, Ops gave him a stone wrapt up like a child to devour, which he did; and by some such device saved Neptune, and Pluto also. Titan, hearing of this, made war upon his brother, subdued him, and threw him into Tartarus, whence he was delivered by his son Jupiter, but, notwithstanding, having learned by the oracle that his son should dethrone him, he laid wait to kill him. Jupiter having notice of it was beforehand with him, surprised him, made him drunk, bound, and gelt him, as he with his sithe had served his father Cœlus, Apoll. Being loosed he fled, and hid himself in Italy, Virg. and was entertained by Janus, who reigned at that time, and gave him part of his kingdom: There he built a city called Saturnia. In his reign the poets fix the golden age, when the earth without culture brought forth every thing, Ov. He first taught the rude people to plough and sow, and invented the sithe, which some make a symbol of husbandry, others take it to be his attribute as the god of time.
